Learning Styles

I wholeheartedly believe that learning styles differentiate between each individual, and that the way the US school system is set up does not reflect each style. The school system, I believe, is still set up with the style of learning of lecture based materials and memorization, a tactic that a lot of students, including me, don't always benefit from. Some individuals are tactile learners, meaning they need to be more hands-on to be able to retain information. This is a style I can say from experience is reflected poorly in our education system, giving rise to the belief that some students don't "try" hard enough, when that is not always the case.
